CONTEMPLATION AND SPIRITUAL COMPANIONSHIP

by Rev. SeiFu Anil Singh-Molares

Whether it’s prayer, meditation, dancing, singing or another form, contemplation is central to our calling as spiritual directors and companions. Contemplative immersion soaks us in the beyond, saturating us with the infinite, the very process we try to invite and manifest in our practice as spiritual companions. And although it is ineffable and beyond description in its essence, it certainly lends itself to the poetry of language, which provides tantalizing invitations for us, and the people we companion. Of course, mystics have also demonstrated it in various other ways over thousands of years.

Any of us coming out of deep contemplative retreats have had cause to reflect on this in (and at) some depth.

Contemplative practice is like going for a swim in many respects. As we splash through the shallow end of the beach, we jump in and immerse ourselves, before proceeding to swim out a bit. What characterizes us spiritual companions is that we tend to swim farther and farther out. And as we do, when we look back at the shore, things that weren’t immediately apparent start to come into view: houses, trees, mountain ranges, and the like. Instead of seeing just the beach itself, we start to see the shore, and our views begin to extend from yards and meters to miles and kilometers. At the same time, people and things that were readily apparent on the shore begin to fade into specks, and then disappear altogether. In short, our perspective shifts dramatically, expanding and contracting at the same time. We see more of the larger picture, and less particulars, allowing us insights as we continue both outward and inward swims simultaneously.

But the dramatically enhanced perspective doesn’t end there, because as we turn to the other side, most often what we will soak in is the blue sky and the blue sea or ocean, vast, and seemingly infinite. And we will feel like solitary, miniscule specks in the face of eternity.

Just as we are!

The relevance of these deep contemplative incursions (and excursions at the same time) to our practice as spiritual companions is significant.

Like the deep water swimmers that we are, we gain perspective on our lives, and their comparative importance (or perhaps better said “lack thereof”) the more we immerse ourselves in our contemplative practices. Our prayers, meditations, and other contemplative approaches help us gain insight into the bigger picture. On the relative level, as we swim out, we also witness our own personal, and often trivial, concerns as just that—small, and part of a much larger and interconnected fabric between all beings and things. As this fabric reveals itself to us, we can breathe even more deeply, so that we might acknowledge that our worries are really much less concerning than we sometimes believe. Of course, we should certainly address them, but keeping in mind their context, and how they seamlessly interweave and interconnect with those of others.

And again, as we turn our sights to the endless sea and boundless sky, we see an even bigger picture, that of eternity itself. This helps us with issues of life and death, and ultimate meaning, our central concern as spiritual companions and directors.

These contemplative practices feed what we can bring to our companiones, by inviting them to reflect and live into their own immersions with God and the Beyond, so that they too may gain the perspectives and insights that flow from those discernments. And so that they might feel more at ease with the temporal and the infinite, in one and the same breath.

Of course, this picture would not be complete without mentioning that deep water swimming requires good skills! We have to learn to swim at our own pace and measure. And to discover our limits, so that we may become aware of when we need to turn back to shore, lest we risk drowning.

So it is that even seasoned directors and companions need to be accompanied, and supervised, ourselves, in much the same way that we do for our own companiones. Because ultimately, we are all in this together, bound and liberated one and all in the flow of the endless.

Red tailed hawk
Screeches across the brilliant blue sky
looking for her supper.
Two geese silently come to rest
along the creek bed.
A dove in the near distant trees
calls out a love note seared with longing.
Closer by, an inchworm makes her way
Up the leg of my lawn chair.
And who am I?
Just a witness,
to the immense beauty
of an afternoon in spring.
A soul caught between
The inch worm of earth
And the hawk of heaven.
In the thick and thin lines
Between being and becoming.
